Special Notice for Relationship Counseling

Relationship counseling often focuses on systemic issues. The client is both the individual and the relationship. Participation by both members of the relationship is encouraged. However, individual sessions with the therapist are sometimes warranted.

I'm happy to discuss options for individual sessions, as long as you agree that anything you share in an individual session may be talked about in subsequent sessions as three. This doesn't mean that I'll necessarily bring up the issues that we've talked about individually, only that you've given me permission to do so if I believe it is important to the health of your relationship.

Knowing that I do not, and will not, keep secrets helps everyone feel safer in therapy. It also allows me to be completely honest, without having to worry about who said what, when, etc. Please ask before sharing any details if you have any questions about whether a topic is one that will need to be shared. If you have reservations about raising an issue with me in the context of relationship counseling, I'm happy to refer you to another counselor for individual counseling.

This agreement also applies to phone calls and e-mails. If you contact me between sessions, I will expect you to let the other know that you've done so. Contents of phone calls or e-mails may be shared. By signing this agreement, you're giving me permission to discuss (or help you discuss) information shared in individual sessions or communications with others regularly attending therapy with you. This discussion will include determining whether sharing this information is needed or important for the therapeutic process, as well as when and to what extent sharing is appropriate.
